.Q: How can I prepare for and manage a job search while I'm still at a company? Background: I work as a software developer at a large company (in finance). I've been there for 10 years and have very good experience. I am not looking to leave the company, though I'd be willing to change locations or to look for a different role. I have been preparing for a while and have been actively seeking out new opportunities. However, the company I work at is an R&D company, and our development cycle is extremely fast, so it is not unusual for me to have 10-15 new projects each year. In the past, my ability to say "no" and actively move on was hindered by the fact that my projects were also the backbone of our research into a new technology, and I was keen to keep up with that. However, now that the new technology has been worked on for a while, I understand that I can do that without being too worried about losing out on continuing to be a part of the R&D. Question: I want to continue to work at my current company and keep up with new technologies, but now that I am clear that I am not working on core R&D I have questions about what I should be doing to prepare for and manage a job search. One of the main things that worries me is that if I look for jobs while I'm still at work then I will be viewed as a "job hopper" and that will negatively impact my career. I know that recruiters and HR people are also concerned about me being easily available, and that I will be asked to share information about what
